Dear ladies and gentlemen,

68projects is pleased to introduce Colombian artist Giorgio Celin's first solo exhibition in Berlin titled 'Graduation'.

Giorgio Celin presents us with a series of works where he depicts what the migratory journey means to him from his personal experience, he himself growing up in Colombia and then migrating to a few different destinations in Europe. This migration story is reflected in his works as well as his experiences as a queer person in the 21st century. The characters in his glowing paintings have some kind of sorrow one can observe on their facial expressions and the way they carry their bodies, with movement and motion depicted on the way they hold themselves, having a kind of urgency making themselves scarce. The companionship and closeness that the characters depict whilst embracing one another create a sense of community, the people he paints are mostly characters that are marginalized and ostracized by society portraying an intersectionality of queerness and immigration. Raising questions of belonging and seclusion.

"Insignias of queer subculture are merged with the formal language of his homeland as well as European visual languages. Influenced by Japanese comics from the 1970s and beyond, the self-taught artist explores interpersonal moments in a virtuoso manner like few others in his generation.

His paintings are warm and full of tension, the colours at times crazy and overwrought, and then again cloud-like and delicate. As if the colours themselves were cutting capers before coming to rest in a moment of perfect contentment. The depicted scenes are rarely without a certain melancholy. They recall a time when distancing was not required. Looking at them, you think: 'I would like that too'. His moments are so full of emotion that you can't help but empathise and share the yearning. Celin tenderly explores the most diverse sensations, mostly between two people and their relationship to each other. Here, the hands are just as important as the eyes and the posture. Men in Adidas sweatpants or jeans dance or cuddle up closely, dissolving into one another. Sweat and emotional excitement are clearly visible. Often their faces shimmer with what seems like the blue light in a bar.

Celin's pictures leave ample room for the imagination. They conjure up subtle smiles on our faces, infect us with their life-affirming innocence and compel us to look deep inside ourselves.

The paintings feature undefined or undefinable places of longing, as well as places that are familiar or at least recognisable. European metropolises like Berlin, Paris or Barcelona and, of course, Barranquilla, the painter's native city on the Colombian Atlantic coast, known for its legendary carnival, included in the UNESCO Intangible Cultural Heritage List in 2003. Giorgio Celin likes to travel to all these places and share the most colourful experiences with its inhabitants.

The queer figures in these spectacular images are not always clearly binary and their gender seems completely irrelevant. Everyone has similar experiences. Everyone belongs together in a shared world. We all learn from each other and want to be connected. Europe with Colombia, Africans with Indigos. All of us with the world.

Let's be joyful and profound, a seeing eye and a warm heart. This is what Giorgio Celin wants to tell us with his vibrant, intensely expressive imagery. We should gratefully accept it. This beautiful feeling of finding something that often seems lost."
